Using Bernie Dodge's site, webquest.org, I found the following interesting web quests:

http://www.tim-jansen.com/lessons\_misc/how\_computers\_work\_webquest/index.htm

There were two leadership webquest sites that I thought were useful.

The first is:Leadership Quest. It's useful because it involves a process that includes determining effective leadership qualities, interviewing prominent leaders, evaluating them, evaluating oneself in terms of those qualities, determining where potential is greatest for oneself to develop, doing a collaborative project in which the group holds one another to the qualities determined to be most important for effective leadership. The URL is : <http://www.redgie.ca/leadership/>

The second is Leadership Theory: A woman's Perspective. This was useful because, in addition to some of the aspects of the above site, this one also has a collaborative advocacy project, along with an extensive list of useful resources and readings! The URL is <http://webquest.org/questgarden/lessons/08492-051108210414/>

Thaks for a great day. Sleep well!

<http://www.wfu.edu/%7Emccoy/NCTM00/laura.html#INTRODUCTION>

A webquest which involves having students receive $3000 dollars each. They need to plan a summer trip to a country in Asia or Africa which they have studied this year. They must use Excel to make a , make a Powerpoint presentation, and write up a report.

<http://ecedweb.unomaha.edu/gang1.htm>

Students must investigate and stop a criminal group which is causing havoc around the world. They must calculate various exchange rates, etc.

I really did not find any math sites I was thrilled with. I could go with the fist site I and change it a bit. I picked both because of the fact that I teach international students.

Steve,
Here's a short list of webquests that might be of use to me:

<http://homepage.usask.ca/~dl136/refraction/index.html>
This is a 3-part webquest on refraction. It's well thought-out and includes both good research resources and supporting documents such as worksheets.

<http://homepage.usask.ca/~dln136/refraction/index.html>

This is a webquest on making a hydro-powered rocket. I like the way the groups are divided up with descriptions/assignments for the various roles, but the layout of the site is weak

<http://www.public.iastate.edu/~nelehita/Geometry%20Project/index.html>

Teaching the pythagorean theorem in an applied engineering context. I like the idea, but the layout is weak and the references are not appropriate for beginners (63 pages of proofs of the theorem).

<http://webquest.org/questgarden/author/>

This is the "Dodge" site at SDSU that helps one create their own website.
